Spam originates in a number of ways and from a number of sources. In the simplest case, the spam is generated using a web server and a database. The user at the web server inserts a certain number of records into the database. The web server then generates the email and sends the email to a group of people by sending the email from a “spoofed” or faked email address. In another case, a user may generate a list of addresses and email a set of those addresses with the same message. This is referred to as “robo-spamming.” The list may be generated in an organized way to minimize the risk of getting caught by a spam filtering service. In yet another case, a person or a user creates a list of email addresses in a database and sends out a message to the addresses. This is referred to as “bulk mailing” the addresses. The user may purchase lists of names from a variety of sources. They may be organized according to some category or may include names of users or firms. A user may find lists of names or addresses that he or she can use. They may be unique or he or she may be able to purchase lists of all these elements. Another technique for generating spam is referred to as “fake-mailing.” In this case, the user creates a message and sends it from a station at which the user himself has a valid email address. The message usually comes in the form of an email from someone else. In most cases, spam has a certain commercial nature. It may also contain false messages or be disguised as a bill, message from one or more firm, or a request for a particular registration for a website. Spam can also be a form of computer hacking aimed at defrauding a website. Because of its nature, spam has received much attention from the software industry.

For example, various solutions have been proposed to combat spam.

Some propose scanning the content of the mail while it is being generated. Others involve identifying the source of the spam and isolating the source
